

HOLISTIC SCIENCE JOURNAL

Over the past twenty years, Holistic Science and the Holistic Science Journal, published by Earthlinks UK, has cultivated an interdisciplinary exploration of wholeness across science, philosophy, and the arts. Bringing together voices from physics, biology, mathematics, and phenomenology, it has sought to move beyond reductionist accounts of the world toward an understanding grounded in relation, meaning, and lived experience. Through its pages, concepts such as part and whole, observer and observed, and mind and nature have been re-examined as dynamic expressions of an underlying unity.

Over the same period, the wider intellectual and cultural landscape has undergone a significant shift toward questions of wholeness. Developments in quantum physics, systems theory, ecology, and cognitive science have increasingly challenged assumptions of separability and linear causation. At the same time, global interconnection—technological, environmental, and social—has made the limits of fragmented thinking more apparent. Wholeness has emerged not simply as a philosophical ideal, but as a practical necessity.

The continued life of Holistic Science and the Holistic Science Journal depends on an active and engaged community of readers. You are warmly invited to take part—by sharing your reflections, contributing articles, or supporting the work through donation. Each form of participation helps sustain a space for inquiry into wholeness and enables the dialogue to grow in depth and reach.
